

What else?

- Multiple style rules can point to one HTML element. So how do we know which rules really apply?
- The term “cascading” describes the process of filtering down from general to specifics.
- The MOST specific rule is applied at the end

CSS

- CSS also separates how a document looks from how a document is defined.
- In computer science term this idea is called “Separation of Concern” where we want to separate the “content” from “presentation”